At Haiphong, on the 21st June, the wife of YILLIAM C. JACK, of a daughter.

Hongkong, June 27th, 1891, Mr. VERNON, in his letter on the Share Bill published in yesterday's issue, says the supporters of the Bill seem never tired of reiterating that the opposition have no arguments but interested ones to bring forward, and be writes with the declared intention of expressing some, to him, very strong reasons why the Bill should not become law. On examination, however, these reasons are found to be nothing more than a series of abstract propositions unsupported by argument, and the converse of which may be used just as effectively on the opposite side. Mr. VERNON in enumerating his reasons says that first and foremost is the inadvisability of in any way artificially interfering with the normal condition of the share market. A supporter of the Bill may very well retort that the normal condition of the. share market is constantly being interfered with by the operations of bulls and bears and that it is to protect it against this interference, so disastrous in its consequences. that the Bill is brought forward. Mr. VER. Non goes on to say that the market is go- morning and may to expected here on or about verned by its own unwritten law of supply and demand. Hongkong, 26th June, 1891. THE FOOCHOW TEA PLANTATION

SYDNEY B. J. SKERTCHLY

"Nemo " supplies the Foothow Echo with the following notes:-

Dear Sir.—It may not be uninteresting to some of your readers to hear something of the ten plantations in the Northern districts of this prefeature and in the adjoining prefecture of Bu Ning, through which the writer has recenty travelled. About 27 years ago there was not s tea plantation of any importance on any of the beautiful and picturesque hills of Lo-yuen in this ago, however, large tracts were continually being brought under onlivation in different parts of the country, till almost every hill side presented the pleasing aspect of a flourishing and prosperous ten plantation. Passing through these children scattered all over these taitefully onlruin and absolute waste. The plants are still young there, but no care is bestowed upon their cultivation, the shrub is allowed to run to wood and is covered with a grey scale or moss and the awest potato is planted everywhere between and around the tea plant, which is left to shift for itself. The farmer who a few years ago found out was Trang Yuk Shang, came along sent 100 picula of tex to "the market side the junk and asked what the noise was now from the same plantation does not send more The second defendant said that a than 40 or 5 pionls, and declares that the award search for opinm was being made and added that potate is a more profitable grop than the test there was no opium on board. - "he King o'n in Gratteer has an interesting acticle upon tides, which, according to the audient author Pan-p'u-isz (4th century), are produced by the moon, and are greatest when the moon is at its full. The K'inng-chan tides it explains, are, however, different from those on the east China coast, and from those at Live chou Pakhoi] or K'in-chou | Tonkin Gulf] the tide sets through the strait west when it rises and east when it falls, at fixed hours, once a day. But in the eighth and nigth months the tides are exceptionally high, and there are two tides a day: the gradually retiring one o these two tides is called the "old tide," while the gradually rising one is called the "young tide. On the 1st day of the 11th moon the tide sometimes rises at unexpected hours, and this is called the " surreptitions tide ": its beight is nocording to the position of two stars, or heavenly bodies, called the long and short stars," and has nothing to do with the waxing or waning of the

2. The old records say that around the south-east coast of Hainan the tides are high first and third quarters; before and after the two the correct one, and that M. de Longueville's, solstices the tides are high; before and after the equinoxes low; but at the summer solstice it is the day tide which is high, and at the winter solution the night tide. When it is fine, the roar is towards the south; when overclouded th rear is towards the north. TThe word "roar here may perhaps mean "sat" of the tide.

3. - Another noconnitary sthat the rise toward the west and full towards the east through the straits is only imaginary, as the ground is high the tide rises and falls, in se king its level it 10th moon. As there are three "slacks" or to the north-west and low to the south-east. A therefore cruses the illusion that it runs west o east, as the onso may be.

4.—It is argued, again, that the tides rise from extra distance to be travelled west, together with both as regards the superior and the inferior tide M. de Longueville has, however, accepted the extra distance to be travelled west, together with both as regards the superior and the interior together with the superior and the interior together with the superior and th irrogularities around Hairan, the main fact that place on the 15th of the 4th and 10th moons. It which of course must be in any case the same as all Chinese tides rise from the east thus accord. ing with what is observed in the straits and the Tookin Gulf, where the tides at K'im-shon and Liera-chou are later than at Holhow. Another very important observation has to be Longueville's copy of the tide table might not be authoritative, the writer had the actual table now hanging in the Great Temple brought to his bonse and copied there. He finds, to his astonishment, that it differs by one day, from slack water is on the 5th, 6th, and 7th instant of the 6th, 7th, and 8th. This error of one day extends throughout the whole table, so that the 19th of the 12th moon in the Temple copy is over the hours 2 s.m. and 10 s.m. which hours belong to the 30th of the 12th moon in the other copy. This prevading error of one day is nearly uniform, even so far as the one exceptional " middle" hour of the 15th of the 4th moon is concerned, which, in the original Temple table, occurs on the 14th. There are other differences : the 30th day of the 1st moon is "slack water" in the original table instead of being, as one

A LAST REQUEST.

Yes, the dark angel had spread his black wings over the lofty towers of Brackonford, and his sable shadow rested on the roof. The change came quite suddenly, for Lord Ennishere had been unusually cheerful during. the day, but toward evening he grew restless and commenced coughing, and in a moment his wife saw a crimson tide rise to his lips, and from that time all hope died out of her miserable heart. She called the nurse, and they applied ice; and after a while the sick man rallied, and lay still and speechloss, with a certain solemn look in his grey eyes; brave, steadfast, and yet soleme, as though he realised and faced his danger with a valiant heart.

And ever these grey eyes followed one form, and rested on one face. On the face of Katherine, his wife, and by and bye he beckoned her to

And his restlessness continued during the next. few days; and then one morning Mr. Bealo, the lawyer, arrived at the Rectory, and was ashered into the library, where the Rev. Peter was sitting. Mr. Beale, a sensible-looking grave-faced man, shook hands with the Rector, and then at once proceeded to state the object of his visit.

"I have come on a very curious piece of business," he said; " and as you are the joint guardian of the little lord at Brackenford, I thought it but right to see you on the subject." "Yes," answered the Rector quickly and ner-

"I have had an extraordinary notification from a respectable enough firm of solicitors, stating that Lady Engismore was married before her marriage to Lord Eunisinors, and that ther first husband, a Mr. Rochs, was supposed to be lost at sea within a year of the marriage. "Yes," again faltered the Rector. Have you ever beard anything of this first marriage P" asked Mr. Heale quickly, for there was something in the Becter's manner that ex: cited his suspicions. "I-never saw Lady Engismore until she had been married for many years to Lord Englamore," hesitated the Rev. Peter, with downeast "There was some scandal, I remember, about her when she was quite a girl," said the lawyer; something about a love affair with a young fellow that her mother, Mrs. Malden, did not approve of. I wonder if this extraordinary application has anything to do with that old story." The Rector did not speak for a moment; he was pondering what he ought to do. " Do you suppose this -Mr. Roche means to bring his claims into the law courts ?" he said at

" His solicitors state that he has a very strong case, and that Lady Ennismore berself saw him and admitted his identity during the life of Lord Equismere; and his brother, Colonel Roche of the Engineers, also recognised him. And to complicate matters Lady Ennismore—so the lawyers state-had a son by this first marriage who was brought up by his uncle, Colonel Roche, and who is also in the army."

"And this son would be ____" "Don't you see, my dear sir, that if this first marriage is an absolute fact, and can be proved that the poor little fellow up youder is illegitimate and no more Lord Ennismore than I am! The eldest son by the first marriage of course in such a case would be the heir to the property, and not Lord Ennismore's child."

The Rector rose to his feet and began walking up and down the room with irregular foot-"Pardon me, Mr. Prescott," he said a moment later, "but may I ask you a plain question? Have you heard anything of this before?" Then the Rector stopped, but still was silent. "We must, of course, see Lady Ennismore at once on the subject," went on Mr. Besle. "I SCOTH WHISKY. thought her manner very extraordinary the last time I did see her perhaps this had something
